

How to Create an Enforceable Non-Compete Agreement

Today, downsizing and the reality of transient employment relationships have forced employers to protect their economic interests. The departure of well-trained, highly productive employees creates a potential threat to business. Employees often have significant knowledge of the company, which they could share with a competitor or use to start their own business and directly compete. To defend their business and not jeopardize continued, long-term success, one valuable approach is to have employees enter into a series of restrictive covenants with the employer. Restrictive covenants take many forms, some of the most common include: (1) non-competition agreement; (2) non-solicitation agreement; (3) garden leave agreement; and (4) confidentiality agreement. Each of these types of agreements is generally scrutinized by the courts. A non-competition agreement (non-compete) is a type of restrictive covenant sometimes contained in an employment agreement that forbids an employee from participating in some particular activity for a specific period of time and in a specific geographical region. When improperly drafted, however, non-competes can be the subject of legal attack, thereby offering little or no protection. To ensure enforceability of a non-compete, employers must balance the necessity of protecting their legitimate business interest with the fair interests of the employee. Each agreement should be judged independently, paying close consideration to the status of the business, the employees involved, the interests of the business to be protected, and the laws of the state interpreting and enforcing the agreement.
