

Through the Woods

I never ran cross country in high school, begins Hal Higdon in Through the Woods. Reflecting back on a running career that has consumed much of my adult life, this remains the fatal flaw in my resume. I never ran cross country in high school. Higdon, contributing editor for Runners World and author of thirty-five books, including the best-selling Marathon: The Ultimate Training Guide, finally discovered the harrier sport while a student at Carleton College, running through the woods in that small schools Arboretum, winning individual and team Midwest Conference championships his senior year. Thus began a lifetime love of what he considers the purest form of long-distance running. In Through the Woods, Higdon describes courses he has run and runners he has raced while winning National and World Championship medals. Through his word pictures, you will learn what it feels like to run in Van Cortlandt Park, the Indiana Dunes and on trails from California to New Zealand to Sweden. You will meet also seven remarkable teenage girls who, in his last season as high school coach, set their sights on the Indiana State Championships. Could they win? Could they even qualify for that prestigious race? These climactic chapters are an expansion of an article Higdon wrote for Runners World, one he identifies as the single best-received article he ever wrote in nearly five decades contributing to that magazine. Here is your chance now to join Hal Higdon running Through the Woods.
